A LESSON IN FRACTIONS.

It was such a blow to me—such a bitter, overwhelming blow. I had been so comfortable and happy since the schoolmaster had bearded with me. The big front chamber had been so grim and ghostly, always shut up and empty. It was our spare room when poor dear Charley was alive; but now that I was a widow and poor, it was a needless luxury to keep a guest chamber. None of our old friends cared to visit me now; just when I needed them most, when I was lonely and sad and miserable, they refused to come. But when Mr. Slade took the room, I didn't grieve about the loss of friends. It seemed odd to have money for the guest chamber, but the way I was situated reconciled me to the thought very speedily.

Then when my boy Charley got into that scrape at school, I should have died if it had been anybody but Mr. Slade.

"Madam," said he, "your boy is missing to the needle. I have those pertaining to the prefixed. It have the deep the condition of trust and confidence—no less, I may say to you, dear madam, than a professor's chair."

I hadn't the least idea what he meant. I knew that one chair differed very much from another, and whereas one was comfortable, easy and enjoyable, another might be for the time being a scat of torture, but wherein a professor's chair excelled I could not at that time imagine. I sat quite still, and the ruffle fell from my hand; my foot rested upon the treadle of the machine, and I sat and stared at Mr. Slade like one demented.

"And it has occurred to me that the position I have held here, which is an excedingly easy and pleasant one, might profitably and suitably be filled by one of the other sex; the duties are not at all arduous, and could be performed more readily, it appears to me, than those pertaining to the needle.
